

Life of Edward H. Rollins: A Political Biography (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Life of Edward H. Rollins: A Political Biography For nearly seventy-five years after the government was founded, the principal gateway of political preferment was through training at the bar. When in the fifties slavery agitation broke the solidarity of old political parties, it brought to the front new leaders. It was not the men of the legal profession, trained as they were to respect precedent, who were first moved, as a rule, to break away from party ties and embark in a movement which promised neither political emolument nor honor. Therefore, it occurred that voices hitherto silent and men unaccustomed to lead came or were forced to the front to give utterance and direction to the crusade against slavery. They stepped from all walks of life. They were tribunes of the people. They spoke as they were moved to speak by the intensity of their feelings, and they began the organization of their scattered forces into an aggressive army which they led through successive defeats to final victory.
